See the latest news here. ——— Update, 4/18: The Senate has passed the House-passed version of the budget deal in a major procedural win, but the fate of the bill is far from certain. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has been trying to rally support for a budget deal that would prevent a government shutdown and lift the debt ceiling into May. To do that, the Senate version of the bill must be passed in a procedural vote on Monday, or, if it can't be, Democrats would have to allow a new series of spending cuts to the sequester levels of March 2013, according to the New York Times. Senate Minority Leader Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) has been demanding that there be no increase in the debt ceiling — the limit on how much the federal government can borrow — until a deal is reached on immigration. The House rejected his idea on Wednesday, sending the deal to the Senate. The House voted on Thursday on a deal to raise the debt ceiling through February 8, as well as to prevent a government shutdown, in exchange for some concessions on Obamacare and spending levels. The plan was approved, 258 to 167, in a major procedural victory for Republicans. But with Senate Democrats also unlikely to vote for the House plan, House Republicans now have to turn to a different bill from Senate Republicans. If they can't win over 60 senators to pass the deal, the House will have to pass a series of continuing resolutions to extend spending levels. So what does this mean for immigration? The first part of the deal on the debt ceiling is the "principle of regular order" of budgeting and avoiding a default. This means that the debt ceiling should be raised in a way that is subject to regular order. This means that the Senate would have to set aside some time for amendments to the budget resolution that includes whatever deal is made on immigration, as well as for additional spending cuts. Senate Republicans have already been trying to force the House to pass the Senate's version of the deal, 1d6a3396d6
