Field of the Invention The invention relates generally to high strength compositions of nonlinear elastic polymers. More particularly, the invention relates to high strength elastomeric compositions having an increased modulus. 2. Description of Related Art Elastomeric compositions have been used for many years in a wide variety of applications. These applications include products such as hoses, belts, cables, seals, tie down straps, bumpers, gaskets, automotive components and sporting goods. Such elastomeric compositions have been used to provide a multitude of material properties such as elongation, tensile strength, elongation at break, compression set, thermal stability, and tear strength. In view of the stringent global environment and the cost of petroleum, there is a growing need to develop elastomeric materials that provide lower energy and lower cost elastomeric products. To meet this demand, non-petroleum derived additives have been produced and incorporated into elastomeric systems.

The purpose of this paper is to describe the role of cholinergic autoreceptors in the regulation of the activity of ganglion cells in the retina in vivo, based on an examination of the effects of locally applied cholinergic and nicotinic agonists and antagonists, on ganglion cell action potentials and on the spatially averaged light-evoked potential of the electroretinogram. Small amounts of acetylcholine (ACh) or carbachol applied locally to the retina in the dark suppress the ganglion cell light-evoked response, an effect that is abolished in the presence of atropine. Local application of the nicotinic agonists nicotine (NIC) and dimethylphenylpiperazinium (DMPP) also inhibits light responses and their effects are blocked by d-tubocurarine. Local application of the nicotinic antagonist mecamylamine suppresses both ganglion cell responses and light responses. These results support a role of nicotinic receptors in the regulation of the photoreceptor-to-ganglion cell synapse. The effects of locally applied ACh and NIC on ganglion cell responses are little affected by the systemic administration of atropine, scopolamine or mecamylamine. The results also indicate the presence of a muscarinic-cholinergic receptor not sensitive to the locally applied antagonists. The effects of the locally applied
