Festival Tycoon is a small, quick-play party game. It plays like a city builder, but with a game show theme. You play as a festival producer in a world full of festivals. You start with $1000 and as you host festivals you earn money which you can then use to buy new facilities, create new entertainment acts and upgrade your existing acts. Players can choose which acts to host from a range of entertainment acts, from a singer to a dancing dog. After every festival, the winner is crowned with the “Festival King” title and receives 100k in prize money. Festival Tycoon was originally released on Steam Early Access on 17th May 2018. I’m still looking for more people to help with the development of the game. I’m not trying to be greedy, it’s just a small indie game with a small budget and my time is limited. I need to use that time efficiently and spending it on development instead of on this pack isn’t going to cause any problems. If you're interested in helping me with the development of the game, please message me on Twitter and Twitch and I'll get back to you. Please follow the compilation instructions. I tested the game against a few of these platforms and played it extensively and they all seem to work fine:

- Windows: Visual Studio.Net 2003
- Mac OSX:g++ (MacPorts)
- Linux:g++ (Redhat, Debian, Ubuntu)
- PSP: Gecko browser

The game also has some development tools if you need to develop the game yourself. Please read the Compiling the Application section.

If you have any other issues, either note the problems on the development page, or contact me on my blog (it's actually a good design decision for engine developers).

In Network E.L.E. you use a motion controlled VR peripheral to pilot a UFOship while trying to destroy enemy UFOs. You also have a "secondary" role as a mechanic which involves opening panels to be repaired, releasing stores of power, and operating various systems on your craft. The mechanic's secondary role allows for the use of both VR motion and controllers. However, there will be no secondary gameplay with the controllers. - The game is built on top of the ARP.VR project. - ARP.VR uses a headset-based tracking system that works well with VR motion controllers, but is also able to track controllers if they are connected via USB. - The VR controllers also require a Windows OS, but all controllers will connect wirelessly via Bluetooth if your OS does not use an OS version that supports Bluetooth. All versions of Windows are supported. - ARP.VR includes a headset-tracking application that will run on any Windows OS. - ARP.VR releases the tracking data to the game at "medium" and "high" levels using the default VR headset. These default settings make it easiest to use without the need for controller tracking, and with the minimal VR tracking requirements. - ARP.VR also includes "full" tracking settings that will consume more resources, and may benefit those with dedicated high-end VR headsets. - ARP.VR is designed to be a proof-of-concept and does not come with a detailed 3D rendering engine, ability to save, and many other features that a real game would have. - This release is the first of many VR games that ARP.VR will develop. - Network E.L.E. is a simple VR game that uses the ARP.VR core, and gets a lot of help from the engine. - Network E.L.E. is not a requirement for ARP.VR, and we plan to release additional demos with more advanced features. - Network E.L.E. is a simple VR game. You can even join multiplayer games with multiple people. Overview of the Basic Gameplay 1) Getting Started ARP.VR includes a tracking application that can run on Windows OS. To use this default medium level of tracking, simply follow the instructions to install the ARP.VR application. This will automatically start the ARP.VR application when you put on the headset, and launch the game when it is ready. If your current Windows OS does

What's new:

(18th century BC - 4th century AD) Having looked at how effective a dedicated zoo is, let's have a look at the better-known stories of how animals managed to get into the zoos to begin with, and see if we can't round off the series with a scrapbook of actual zoological garb & equipment. At the end of the day, how a zoo manages to acquire its animals will help define the place - this will act as a starting point for a narrative. Grooms (Grooms is the costumed word used by some historians - 'guards', 'attendants' or 'keepers' are common alternatives in English) are regular people who work for zoos and look after most zoo animals and keep them safe - sometimes they are volunteers and sometimes they are employees. Their story encompasses all the important parts of a zoo (in my mind), so let's delve in. The Rising Role of Grooms In the 18th Century, Zoological Gardens were severely lacking in necessities, being intended for the aesthetic and education of the public rather than the wellbeing of animals. They were seeing their first emergence of legalist means of admission. Admission into the public was meant to be temporary for the same education and public exposure with fines, privacy and mandatory moral reforms. The current issue of each zoo ranges from 20 animals to 100 animals and the original private zoos in the 17th century had animals to between 100 and over 1000 animals. This meant that the public was quite spaced out into the many keeper-controlled areas. The public wasn't allowed to hold these animals so it was not on display. By 1810, zoos had had one year of legalisation and the public was unimpressed. There was little welfare to the animals at this time and the public enjoyed the chance to hold animals and check out new and interesting specimens. Slowly, the government was slowly yielding to the public interest and a realisation that zoos needed to be properly run. The deeper public interest came along with the realisation of the management problems in zoos which were still mainly private. It was the first real step forward for zoological gardens but even still, decades had passed. There is no record of conscious campaigning for change, it was just kind of left up to the public to demand better more hygienic zoos. Zoos were becoming better attended, and zoological gardens being allowed
